

A public information/entertainment monopoly would be more destructive of true democracy than a commercial monopoly, say of car manufacturing.

Small or locally owned broadcasters and news publishers provide the surrounding people with news of their own area and are more responsive to their interests. This provides a healthy foundation for democratic participation both in local issues and in wider political ones.